IT is customary for most authors to introduce themselves and work to their readers through the medium of a more or less prolix Preface, Foreword, Introduction, Apology, or Explanation. The infinite number and variety of disingenuous excuses that have been employed by them to palliate the just indignation of a longsuffering public, leave but one to the author which has not already been used to the vanishing point of patience, and upon which he seizes with avidity. Happily the sentiment of mankind covers the errors of extreme youth with the stainless mantle of charity. The sins and follies of the young become crimes and misdemeanors in the old, and for this reason only dare the author of Desdemona, handicapped with lack of years and experience, diffidently approach his readers, assured that through his youth alone he must expect absolution. If any other excuse were necessary for the publication of this afflictive volume, it may be found only by the profoundly astute, in the very old, hackneyed and vulgar motive on the part of this writer to experience the deliciously novel sensation of speculating upon his own exertions, and enjoying a reasonable share of the anticipated deficit. w. H. H. IN Venice, long ago, when doges great Maintained with patriotic zeal the State; When glory like a mantle robed the queen Of Adrias waters with a golden sheen; When speedy galleys bore her warriors brave The foe to conquer, and the friend to save, Or...
